You don't have to do this perfectly

If your dog is undergoing treatment, you're likely doing everything you can.

There may be:

- appointments
- medications
- decisions
- emotions

It can feel like a lot.

Take it one day at a time.

You are already doing more than enough.

Understanding treatment

Treatment may include:

- chemotherapy
- medications
- supportive care

Every dog responds differently

Some dogs tolerate treatment very well

Others may need more rest and support

Your veterinarian will guide the medical side.

Many families focus on:

- comfort
- presence
- observation

What to watch for

During treatment, some pet owners choose to observe small changes.

This may include:

- appetite
- energy levels
- bathroom habits
- mood or behavior

You don't need to track everything perfectly

Just stay gently aware

If something feels off, contact your veterinarian.

Creating comfort at home

This is where many families focus their energy.

You might consider:

- soft places to rest
- quiet, calm environments
- maintaining familiar routines

Simple things can matter:

- a favorite blanket
- sitting nearby
- speaking softly

Your presence can be a source of comfort.

Eating during treatment

Appetite may change

Some days your dog may:

- eat normally
- eat less
- be more selective

Some pet owners find it helpful to:

- offer smaller, more frequent meals
- slightly warming food
- provide gentle encouragement

No pressure - just support

Gentle routines

Dogs often find comfort in routine.

You might try to keep:

- feeding times consistent
- walks (if appropriate), gentle and short
- rest periods uninterrupted

Routine can create a sense of safety.

The emotional side

This part is often the hardest.

You may feel:

- hopeful one moment
- overwhelmed the next

Both can exist at the same time.

There is no “right” way to walk through this.

Caring for yourself

You are carrying a lot.

Please remember:

- It's ok to step away.
- It's ok to ask for help.
- It's okay to feel everything.

You matter in this, too.

From Paris' Promise

This foundation exists for moments like this.

Not just the diagnosis...

...but everything that comes after.

If you need support, encouragement, or resources, we are here to offer care and connection.

A gentle reminder

You don't need to do everything perfectly.

You don't need to have all the answers.

You just need to:

- Love them.
- Be with them.
- Take the next step.

You are doing better than you think.
